Andrea DeAngelis- Three Poems

Magnetic

a chained-up moment caged in a delirious choleric storm moan about lazy Suzy tornadoes and 26 hour diner woes filled to the brim with delirium coffee spilling philosophy and no eternity

UFO Gigolo

she is always here in the diner stuffed in the corner where you won't see her unless you want to her elaborate mass eatings consuming fleshy nipples visions allow her to ask these boys sweet stares as if crushing tickles wandering minds unwrap you naked

she is here
sucking attention her skirt hiked up to unflattering contours rigid varicose valleys of lost men and expectations sit back and enjoy the witching hour ride while the room spins round to your clucking demise.

seven minutes

Everyone acted normal in the abnormal light everyone acted as if this was a common occurrence as if the sky had just been swallowed just for them
just for seven minutes and their minimal generation.

Flattened

Do you remember that eclipse?
How everything was flattened within?

Shadows were fattened up and everyone's souls were stretched out too thin before them.

I was not a part of it because you were with her and I was with no one.

In those seven minutes loneliness had a heaviness it dragged me to the ground and drowned.

All my senses grew sickened and senseless like death never coming like continuing to exist after she kissed you.
